

Building a Compliant Infrastructure

Can you afford your current compliance strategy? Ask the experts.

The impact of Sarbanes Oxley, HIPAA, The Patriot Act, and other government regulations is just beginning to affect organizations' bottom line. Companies are starting to define and refine their compliance strategy—taking a more strategic approach—realizing the business opportunities that regulatory compliance, corporate governance, and litigation support requirements offer to their organizations.

Defining that compliance strategy depends on:

- Identifying compliance risks and benefits
- Building a flexible extensible infrastructure that can address evolving needs rather than a series of point solutions
- Establishing crisp communications between business process owners and the IT personnel responsible for compliance implementation
- Investing wisely in capital expenditures versus manual, error-prone tasks to support repeatable, documentable processes with the necessary built-in controls

Join Sun Microsystems and Cynthia Marcotte Stamer, Risk Management and Solutions Lawyer, for an executive breakfast to find the answers to these questions:

- Can I afford to do every year what I did last year to meet compliance requirements?
- Has compliance timing forced a band-aid or do I have a strategic approach?
- Can I provide a timely response to support legal search and inquiry, including full audit trails and all associated records?
- Can I afford to keep everything forever?
- Does my compliance strategy hinder or enhance my business strategy?
